

Pictures

During Prince Philip and Queen Elizabeth II's visit to Canada in 2005, marking the centennial anniversary of the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan, Colonel Williams served as their personal pilot. In the above photo, Williams (left) walks with the Queen after landing at London's Heathrow Airport.

Williams (second from left) poses during his September 2009 visit to Canadian Forces Station Alert, located in the Arctic Circle, accompanied by John Williams, the mayor of Quinte West (third from left). Williams committed his first (known) sexual assault the night he returned from this trip.

Larry Jones, the “Mayor of Cosy Cove,” stands outside his home near Tweed. Behind him is the cottage belonging to the neighbor that he still believes had tried to frame him, disgraced colonel Russell Williams.

Williams’s Cosy Cove cottage, where the colonel raped and murdered Jessica Lloyd, sits perched on the banks of Tweed’s Stoco Lake.

In one of the thousands of self-portraits taken while breaking into homes to steal and pose in women’s undergarments, Williams is seen modeling the bra and panties of one of his unsuspecting victims.

Williams often took photos of his “trophy,” painstakingly organized and neatly laid out. The above photo shows one of these meticulous arrangements, found by police in one of the many deftly hidden folders on the colonel’s personal computer.

Marie-France Comeau, 38, a corporal in the Canadian Forces, was found murdered in her Brighton, Ontario, home on November 25, 2009. Williams later confessed to the grisly sex slaying of the dedicated soldier who had served under his command.

Crime scene photo taken by police showing the basement of Comeau’s home, where Williams had first entered and confronted the single woman. In the foreground is the jack post to which Williams had tied his victim while taking explicit photographs during the prolonged attack.

Jessica Elizabeth Lloyd, 27, was reported missing by her family on January 29, 2010. She was later found murdered, her body discarded in a wooded area on the outskirts of Tweed, Ontario. Colonel Williams confessed to having raped, tormented, and strangled her over a period of almost twenty-four hours, and personally led police to the remote site where he had dumped her remains.

Police photograph comparing a tire impression found at Jessica Lloyd's property with one taken from Williams's Nissan Pathfinder. This evidence was presented to Williams during his police interview on February 7, 2010, after which he later confessed to two murders.

Police comparisons of Williams's boots (which he had worn to the interview at which he later confessed) with tread impressions found in mud behind Jessica Lloyd's home.

Jessica Lloyd's rural home sits on a largely barren and lonely landscape, just north of "The Friendly City," Belleville, Ontario.

Jessica Lloyd's bedroom as found by police investigators following the report of her disappearance on January 29, 2010.

Williams strikes a defensive pose during his lengthy and intensive questioning by Detective-Sergeant Jim Smyth at Ottawa Police headquarters on February 7, 2010.

Police and prosecutors address the media on the front steps of the Belle-ville Superior Court of Justice following Williams's sentencing. From left to right are: Ontario Provincial Police sergeant Kristine Rae, Detective-Inspector Chris Nicholas, Belleville Chief of Police Cory McMullan, and Crown Attorney Lee Burgess.

Williams's defense attorneys, Vince Clifford (left) and Michael Edelson, make a brief statement to members of the media outside the Belleville courthouse following their client's sentencing hearing on October 21, 2010. They refused to take any questions afterward.
